Support and Counselling in Cases of Discrimination, Abuse of Power, Bullying, Sexual Harassment and Violence

Fairness, equal treatment and appreciation in dealing with each other, including in dealing with conflicts, should be a matter of course at the University of Fine Arts. This can only succeed if every single person – whether student or employee – takes responsibility for it. A culture of looking at is supported and not one of looking away when there are conflicts or when these are looming. Sexualised violence, harassment, discrimination and derogatory behaviour have no place at the University of Fine Arts or anywhere else!

Discrimination is any form of disadvantageous and arbitrary treatment of persons based on their descent, religion, nationality, origin, physical abilities, disabilities, political activities, sexual identity, gender or age. In particular, this includes oral or written statements to that effect.

Abuse of power is the exploitation of dependencies at the workplace, in the course of studies as well as when dealing with resources, taking the form of a threat and/or realisation of personal or professional disadvantages or the promise of advantages.

Bullying is harassing action by one or more persons against an individual or a group of persons that extends over a long period of time and is characteristic of the relationship between the persons concerned. The action is usually intended to damage the victims’ reputation and/or drive them out of their position.

Examples of such acts are: spreading rumours about university members and their families – deliberate withholding of information necessary for work or deliberate disinformation – threats and humiliation – defamation of university members and their families – abusive and hurtful treatment – slighting by superiors, such as being assigned impossible, meaningless or no tasks.

Sexualised discrimination is behaviour that violates the dignity of the person concerned and creates a climate of intimidation, degradation and insult based on sexualised acts. Sexualised discrimination is used as a means to demonstrate power and superiority over other people and also to affect others in their career path. Sexualised discrimination does not have to be intentional. It is sufficient if the person concerned feels harassed and this can be understood. Such discrimination also takes place if the person concerned tolerates it. Sexual discrimination can also be constituted by a single act. Forms of sexualised discrimination are, for example: sexualised language such as sexist generalisations, jokes or slogans – remarks referring to physicality, remarks about intimate private life – unwanted verbal, pictorial or electronic presentations of sexualised depictions – unwanted sexualised acts and solicitations of such acts – persecution, stalking and coercion with a sexual background – rape.
Counselling

Below is an overview of the places to go for counselling. These centres and contacts try to point out possible ways of solving problems and to inform about the possibilities of complaints and sanctioning measures. If a solution cannot be reached even with the help of counselling, affected persons can lodge formal complaints. Before doing so, they should obtain detailed information about their occupational and legal options from the centres and contacts listed below. The principles of counselling are: anonymity, voluntariness, confidentiality, (professional) independence and neutrality – as far as there is no obligation to act on the part of the counselling persons. After this counselling, the person concerned makes the decision whether to proceed and which measures should be initiated in terms of a complaint.
